The use of one or more wheeled vehicles by a human operator in normal operation provides various advantages. Most importantly, while such vehicles are not normally motorized, they are nonetheless enabled to travel throughout a given environment without the use of the person's hands. Consequently, these vehicles become desirable tools for use in a variety of applications. For instance, it is known that when a person cannot use their hands, the person's legs and arms can be used to transport and manipulate objects. For example, the person can use their legs to carry things, or to grasp and carry items. Additionally, the person can use their arms to push or pull objects, or can carry objects in their arms. Vehicles that are constructed as wheeled vehicles, with the wheels being positioned relatively close together, are known as "pinch and roll" vehicles. By way of example, in these vehicles, the operator normally places his/her legs close together to effectively pinch the wheel(s) between the legs. As the vehicle rolls, the operator's legs move with the wheel(s) and roll so that the entire vehicle does not move. In the pinch and roll mode of

This study is aimed at assessing the effect of optimizing two culture parameters (time of addition and concentration of sodium nitrate) on the production of Trichoderma spp. hydrolysate by employing the Taguchi method. Trichoderma isolates were obtained from sediment samples collected from tannery effluents and organza-sand soil in Kerman, Iran. Trichoderma spp. were grown on a modified medium (Czapek's, sucrose, starch, and yeast extract) consisting of casamino acids, sucrose, and malt extract, and incubated at 28+/-1 degrees C for 72 h. Sodium nitrate was added in two concentrations: 1 and 3 g/L at 30, 60, or 90 min. The non-parametric Kruskal-Wallis test was used to investigate the effects of the concentration of sodium nitrate at various time points and its individual and interactive effects on the production of hydrolysates of the selected Trichoderma isolates. The results showed that addition of sodium nitrate at 90 min with 1 g/L concentration had the most significant effect on the production of hydrolysates of Trichoderma isolates. It was also demonstrated that both the time and concentration of sodium nitrate significantly influenced the production of hydrolysates by Trichoderma isolates.Arthroscopic treatment of deep articular cartilage lesions of the elbow in patients younger than 25 years: long-term results.
