Fans were allowed onto the Intel Fanzone only a couple of hours before kick-off at the Olympic stadium, with thousands of others desperate to get a ticket but unable to find a spot in the queue. The German press reported that some fans were turned away and lost their entries, leaving them unable to register for tickets. Security guards were out on the streets with long queues of fans, while a huge number of police were also on the streets to prevent any disturbance. (Image: Getty Images Europe) The queues were even longer than in Madrid four years ago where the final was a sell-out. Liverpool fans tried to gain entry to the fanzone at 7am on Monday morning, but were turned away due to security fears. By 9am, the doors opened and fans queued at the newly created tent where they had to queue at an unmanned kiosk, enter their details online and wait for their blue print to be taken. "We're so excited. There are so many fans, we have been waiting for hours. We're only allowed in through the VIP section, but the real fans are waiting. We're not going to give up," said fan Mika Hewitt. "We didn't expect this much. We need to go and see, we might be lucky and get a ticket. This is for our fans to make the most of it. We are so glad we came from Liverpool." One of the biggest fears was there were no parking bays anywhere in the nearby
