It depends on the image, but sometimes the overall brightness of the object relative to the background can affect the decision. But of course, the best policy is to use a tripod and use ambient light. When shooting hand-held, it is better to use something with a large zoom lens (something that can magnify a distant object) to make sure the background is not overexposed. What camera or lens is best for night photography? You can see that most of the recommendations above focus on night photography with a DSLR. There's no reason not to take the same approach with SLRs to get sharp images of bright lights in low light. But a good solution for digital photography is just to use a camera with a high ISO rating (up to 3200, or 12800 if it has a dual card slot). There's no specific camera or lens best for night photography. The best choice depends on what kind of image you want. If you want one of those sharp, clean images, you want to get the lens that will make it possible. However, if you want to shoot a good amount of fine details (like hair) or sports, you might want something that is a little more noisy. It all depends on what you are shooting. The most important factor in capturing a good night photograph is experience and practice. Once you do that, you'll realize that it is not actually that hard to take a nice photo, you just need to find the good settings and pay attention to the lighting and background. And with time, you'll get better and faster at it. How do I use the ISO setting? As I mentioned above, ISO is the sensitivity of the camera sensor. This determines how sensitive the camera can be to light. A high ISO can increase the sensitivity to light, which makes it more likely to get a good shot. However, if the sensor is too sensitive, it may produce a lot of noise on the image. This will make it harder to make out fine details. For
