Guiyu is the site of a massive and highly toxic spill of polychlorinated biphenyls (PCBs) from a factory that processed the chemical from 1958 until its owners were forced to close it in 2002. PCBs are a group of 50 highly toxic chemicals that were once common in electrical equipment, but are now banned in most nations due to their link to several types of cancer and other health problems. PCBs leaching into the environment is a long-standing problem in the area around Guiyu, and it's likely that the chemicals are still entering the local water supply. Based on research the UK has done in the area, HRW estimates that an additional 76,000 people living and working in the area have been exposed to PCBs above safe levels. Authorities in Guiyu had made local residents nervous about access to water due to fears it would be contaminated, the HRW statement said. In 2016, local officials announced that water from the springs at the epicentre of the original PCB leakage was being diverted to a local reservoir, where it has been drinking for two years. Health experts and activists have called on authorities to ensure water is safe for all, and to halt work to close the springs. "These mountains were drained and covered with concrete to make room for other industries, even though the water still contains high amounts of toxic chemicals," said Teng Biao, founder of the environmental group Guiy f988f36e3a
